

Good Morning Friends:

He is a great Englishman whose memory the future historians will doubtless enshrine with Pitt, Disraeli, and Walpole.

The British Prime Minister arrived in Washington in full war-time secrecy. He was immediately taken to the White House where he is the guest of President Roosevelt. These two great leaders of the world's two great democracies are devising plans and broad strategy to combat and defeat the ruthless forces of the authoritarian nations who have forced us to join issue with them to the death.

"Blood, sweat and tears" was the doleful lot which Prime Minister Churchill promised the people of Great Britain in their dark hour. "Blood, sweat, and tears" they have suffered and must continue to suffer ere victory over a mighty foe comes within their embrace.

This great Englishman, who has led his people from the desperation of Dunkirk to the time when America has joined hands with them in an inflexible resolve to destroy and erase from the face of the earth the forces of aggression and tyranny, has come to us in our hour of initiation to the horrors of the grim art of war, bringing us cheer and courage, to be true, but reminding us that "blood, sweat and tears" must likewise be our unhappy lot as we engage in the shifting fortunes of war.

Those who have read the pungent, flowing prose of Churchill's pen and those who have listened to his resonant, simple, strident, moving oratory, recognize in him the master of the language which is his inheritance. Perhaps no
